Customer Reviews

I found this book to have some interesting points. However, the section going on about the brain, well, I don't know if I was tired while reading that part but it went right over my head.

After years of starting a project and quitting after one chapter or 40,000 words, I felt like I needed a pep talk. I'm not usually one for self-help books, if that's what you'd like to call this one, but buying this book was the best decision I've made in a long time. I read it once through, quickly scribbling down notes and feeling my heart beat faster as I thought, "Yes! That's it exactly! She's describing ME." The author's life stories were entertaining and humbling, especially that bit where she wrote 6 books in one year. (SHEESH.)As soon as I was done with the first go, I read it all over again, going over the fine bits more slowly, creating a plan for myself that seems so doable now. The advice in this book is perfect for anyone who struggles with the inner editor, or if perhaps you're feeling too disorganized or over your head with a project. And it's filled with motivational quotes and anecdotes that you can apply to your own situation. I learned not only what my true end goals were, but also how to achieve them, taking tiny measurable steps. Seriously, give this book a try. It's worth every penny.

Nina Harrington is definitely an authority when it comes to coaching authors on the fine points of showing up to a blank page and filling it with creative wisdom. As we know, writing is not an easy job to do, and what makes it more challenging is when an author is faced with procrastination, perfectionism, and a blank page that creates a great deal of fear for any author. Nina has years of writing experience, having written dozens of books in multiple languages and countries. Throughout the book, her voice guides the author through the many emotions and obstacles that prove challenging. The goal: To help you get your book written. After reading this book you will have greater self-esteem, confidence, and bravery to tackle your inner critic and procrastinator. By the time I was done reading, I had already increased my daily writing word count so I know the formula works. A definite recommend for your physical and/or digital library.

Nina Harrington is a prolific writer of romance, an instructor of entrepreneurial, craft writing and self publishing. She knows what she's talking about, drawing on her experience from the science field where she previously worked and her experience of over 15 years as a published writer. Her latest release is all about overcoming fear to reach your writing goals. Harrington discusses a tried and trusted plan to overcome fear, to stop procrastination, and to succeed in a writing career. This book is for fiction and nonfiction writers alike. Fear and procrastination as a reply if that fear haunts all writers regardless of content. By changing the mindset, writers can move beyond what is holding them back. While not a psychological therapy book, it has many steps to help a writer toward their goal. Nina Harrington is a prolific writer and she wants to help other writers become prolific as well. This book gets the right kind of motivation behind the writer, urging them toward the finish line. Using the 5-step plan, it can be related to other areas of anyone's life to stop procrastination and find routines for the ultimate productivity. This book really connected with me. I've been struggling to finish writing the last two chapters of a book for over a year and this helped me get it done in two(ish) weeks. Unlike some other motivational books I've read this feels like someone who's really been there and is sympathetic to fellow procrastinators. I'm a professional writer and artist. I'm no stranger to deadlines. I am, however, relatively new to self publishing, having only gotten out two books of my own so far. I'd been very hard on myself about the problems I was having in finishing my own writing. The shift in attitude and approach that Nina suggests made all the difference. Becoming clearer about my own inner motivation and goals was a game changer for me. The section "How to Re-Write the Stories we Tell Ourselves" seems like something I should have realized on my own, but I didn't. The first few chapters on Self-Motivation and Purpose were especially helpful in my case, but the next part of the book, which analyzes procrastination, perfectionism and addresses self confidence issues was also useful and instructive. Her systematic analysis method for overcoming issues was just brilliant for me. Bottom line, this was helpful information that I will certainly refer to again and again. There's a lot to take in.

So many nuggets of wisdom in this book from a career author who has worked through these issues of negative brain chatter and self doubt that plagues almost all authors. Nina Harrington a scientist turned bestselling romance author, shares how writers can find their true North and understand their why which will motivate them to persist in their writing dream. Nina, goes through the MAGIC system, which she personally tested on herself as she moved from procrastination and fear to being a writer who is super productive. This step-by-step guide will be a resource that will help many struggling writers who feel stuck in their own fear, worries and ultimately procrastination. I definitely recommend this book to all writers who want to get rid of what holds them back so they can achieve their writing dreams :)
